Building Bridges Beyond Academia

Women's Studies at WKU is getting the financial support it needs to survive, thanks to two external donors.

Over the past three years, Women's Studies and Support Programs has received $45,000 from a benefactress who lives in California and who prefers to remain unnamed. She also has promised to contribute $15,000 a year for the next three years. Another gift of $8,500 came from a local donor last year, says Catherine Ward, Director of Women's Studies. According to Ward, "Women's Studies has extremely limited funding from the University; no other academic unit that I know of, other than African American Studies, operates on such a meager University budget as Women's Studies.

Women's Studies currently receives $3,200 annually from the University. This money pays for the salary of a student worker for 10 hours a week, a monthly phone bill and basic supplies. The program is housed in a tiny office, Room 231 of the Ivan Wilson Center for Fine Arts.

"If I need to conduct Women's Studies business..., I usually sit on a bench in the hall or, at times, on the hall floor."

-Catherine Ward

The office is not big enough for two people, Ward says. "If I need to conduct Women's Studies business and the student is working, I usually sit on a bench in the hall or, at times, on the hall floor."

Recently Women's Studies has received permission to hire a half-time secretary, beginning July 1. And President Thomas Meredith has given the Women's Studies Committee a firm commitment that he will assign more space for the program's offices. Ward says she feels both of these decisions have come about as a result of the external recognition that the program has received from its donors and because of the contributed services of members of the Women's Studies Committee.

"External funding also has made it possible for Women's Studies to expand its activities and services both on and off campus," says Ward, a determined woman who has been a leader on behalf of women. "These gifts represent a remarkable show of support, one by a woman who has no connection with the University," says Ward, referring to the Program's major donor. The donor selected WKU's Women's Studies as the recipient of her grants based on a report prepared by a New York journalist whom she hired to investigate programs that were working to improve the lives of Kentucky women.

WKU's Women's Studies and Support Programs, led by a strong group of dedicated women who make up the Women's Studies Committee, has an impressive list of accomplishments. For the past seven years the Committee has sponsored a Women's Studies Conference which has earned respect as an international forum on women's issues. The Conference has always been a self-supporting activity, fueled by the energy and enthusiasm of its organizers. But running the conference is an exhausting job. The Conference chair raises the honoraria for the general session speakers by soliciting money from outside sources and from academic units across the campus. President Meredith, Vice President for Academic Affairs Robert V. Haynes and the Potter College Dean's office have been regular contributors, says Ward. The rest of the Conference expenses are covered by registration fees.

Western also offers a minor in Women's Studies. The growth of university-based Women's Studies programs is evidenced by the establishment of over 500 such programs in North American colleges and universities and hundreds more worldwide. There has been a corresponding growth in feminist scholarship which integrates the thinking and classifications that define women's lives. From its beginning, Western's Women's Studies and Support Program has been committed to building bridges beyond academia.

"Contributions from our two principal donors have made it possible for the Women's Studies Committee to begin to fulfill this commitment," says Ward.

This year the Committee established two awards, one for a student and the other for any

Higher Education and its economic impact

By Jeff Eger

Higher education an industry? You bet!

State expenditures in support of Kentucky's eight public institutions of higher learning have substantial multiplier effects, making for higher levels of income and employment than would otherwise exist in the Kentucky economy. For example, in the 1991-92 fiscal year, every state dollar invested in higher education in Kentucky resulted in $3.40 of total spending. That represents a whopping 340 percent return on investment! State appropriations to the public institutions stimulated $2.29 billion in public and private spending, either directly or indirectly, equal to 4 percent of Kentucky's aggregate 1991 personal income.

As is almost always the case, funding for higher education will be hotly debated during the 1994 legislative session. University budget requests for the biennium generally have been practical, taking into account the well-known budget crunch the Commonwealth is facing. However, part of the debate will center around previous commitments made in 1992 by the Jones administration, as well as the legislature, to fund several capital construction projects currently underway.

Most business people fully understand that there are no returns unless there is some initial investment. Even then, we sometimes find that the return on our investment is not what we might want it to be. And in the business world, there is almost universal agreement on one thing—there are no sure things.

However, in 1991-92, some 68,000 jobs—or 4.2 percent of the state's total employment—would not have existed in the absence of state support for higher education. In addition, wages and salaries throughout the state were $1.56 billion greater than otherwise would have been the case. This amount equaled 3.8 percent of the total wages and salaries received in the state for the year.

These impressive numbers come from a new economic impact study conducted by the Center for Business and Economic Research at the University of Kentucky's College of Business and Economics. An innovative companion study explores how higher education translates into greater earning power throughout a person's life, showing that each year of higher education can add to a person's value in essentially the same way that saving and investing in a long-term bond adds to individual net wealth today. The study estimates that in 1991-92 alone, the eight state universities added $8.5 billion in "human capital" wealth to the students enrolled in the Commonwealth's public institutions.

In addition to the traditional instructional role they play, the universities also brought some $69 million in research dollars and contributed another $72 million for public service activities in 1991-92. Using even the simplest mathematics, it's easy to see that higher education is making a tremendous contribution to the growing economy of the state. These dollars do not simply impact on the communities surrounding each institution, but they also have a substantive impact on every county in the Commonwealth.

Our public universities are evolving to meet the needs of our changing world society, striving for excellence in teaching our children, serving our communities and exploring future avenues for business development through research.

If Kentucky and its citizens are to take full advantage of this great resource and continue to succeed into the 21st century, we must support higher education. That support should be viewed as an investment in Kentucky—for today and for the future.

Founding Fathers of Fitness

What do Jimmy Carter, George Bush, and Bill Clinton have in common? All are avid runners. But these three presidents aren't the first to propound and practice regular exercise. Thomas Jefferson may have been the first fitness president. "No one knows, until he tries, how easily a habit of walking is required," he wrote. And, "Not less than two hours a day should be devoted to exercise...I speak from experience, having made this arrangement myself. Jefferson also understood the sound body-sound mind connection: "If the body be feeble, the mind will not be strong." Follow the exercise prescription!

Fitness Testing Available

The Exercise Physiology Laboratory in the Wellness Center offers a variety of fitness assessment services for individuals of all levels of fitness - from the sedentary, low-fit individual desiring to initiate healthy lifestyle changes to the trained athlete desiring to improve sports performance. Our most popular Basic Exercise Assessment (includes a sub-maximal treadmill test, body composition, flexibility, muscular strength, and individual exercise prescription) is available for $10. To schedule an appointment or to find out about nutritional and other testing services, call the Wellness Center at 745-6531.

person associated with the University, whether student, alum, faculty, or staff. The student recipient will be a woman "who has empowered herself by overcoming a physical, economic, social, personal or legal adversity," says Dr. Lou-Ann Crouther, Associate Professor of English and Chair of the Awards Committee.

The second award will go to an individual who has worked to improve the conditions of women in the area. Dr. Crouther says, "Women have remained unrecognized for too long, and we need to call attention to their accomplishments."

Nominations may be made by sending letters of support and by including documentation that provides evidence of the nominee's activities to Dr. Crouther, Cherry Hall 117. The deadline for applications is March 11. Application blanks have been mailed to all University employees, and Dr. Crouther can be contacted at 5713,

The Awards Committee is also sponsoring a contest to name each award and to grant the contests' winners $50 prizes.

Award recipients and contest winners will be announced at a luncheon April 15 in the Executive Dining Room of the Downing University Center. Luncheon tickets can be purchased from members of the Committee: Dr. Lou-Ann Crouther, Carol Graham, Linda Morrissett and Joyce Wilder.

Development money also will fund on campus activities for National Women's History Month, all of which are free and open to the general public. Dr. Anna Bates, Assistant Professor of History, has directed the planning for a variety of events.

Tomorrow, March 3, at 3 p.m. in Cherry Hall 210, Dr. Bates will present a brief lecture before showing the film, The Women of Hull House.

Monday, March 7, D'Ann Campbell, Dean of Arts and Sciences at Austin Peay State University, will lecture at 7 p.m. in Garrett 103 on Wartime Women:

Women, the Military and the Homefront during World War II.

Tuesday, March 8, a symposium, Portraits of Resistance: Female Rebels, will be presented by Dr. Bates and her students in Cherry Hall 210. "The program will feature women who made a difference in American life," says Dr. Bates, and they will include: Eleanor Roosevelt, the African American Poet Phyllis Wheatley, Pocahontas and Calamity Jane. Refreshments will be served after the symposium.

Tuesday, March 22 at 3 p.m., Dr. Carlton

Jackson, WKU Professor of History, who wrote a biography of the actress Hattie McDaniel, best known for her role in the 1939 motion picture classic, Gone With the Wind, will speak on The Women of Gone With the Wind. That lecture will also be in Cherry Hall, Room 210.

To conclude Women's History Month the Women's Studies Committee is sponsoring a reception for faculty and students interested in Women's Studies Tuesday, March 29 at 5:15 p.m. in Room 226 of the Downing University Center. Dr. Charles Bussey of the History Department and Mary Ellen Miller of the English Department are coordinating this activity.

Ward also is serving as a member of the Bowling Green Women's History Month Committee. She says seven Bowling Green women will be honored at an awards luncheon March 31. More information about that luncheon can be obtained by calling the Human Rights Commission or by picking up information at local businesses which are recognizing Women's History Month by displaying the National Women's History Month poster in their places of business.

In addition to achieving an outstanding record as a professor and researcher in the WKU English Department, Ward also has been at the forefront in her efforts to improve conditions for University women, especially nontraditional women students.

Six years ago Ward helped students establish Women In Transition (WIT), a student-run support group for women over the age of 25. Each year WIT has grown as a much-needed service

A college diploma offers big dividends.

Even for people who never went to college.

Every $1 invested in Kentucky higher education yields the state $3.40 in return. That figure represents an amazing return of 340 percent, but it's only the tip of the economic iceberg that Kentucky's universities provide to the state.

A better-educated work force and outstanding university research facilities will attract scores of blue-chip companies to the Bluegrass. The ripple effect of new businesses coming to our state is increased jobs, higher earnings and an overall better quality of life – even for Kentuckians who never went to college.

If Kentucky and its citizens are to continue succeeding in the 21st century, it's critical we maintain the economic momentum created by our colleges and universities. Don't let Kentucky's economic engine run out of fuel. Support higher education: an investment in Kentucky's future.

organization. Its center in Room 102 of the Garrett Conference Center is operated by volunteers "who help incoming women students adjust to University life, and who work to make the University experience of all of its members efficient, effective and supportive," explains Ward.

Paula Trafton, a senior History and English major, is this year's president. Trafton says that WIT is supported mainly by members' dues and by contributions made by faculty and friends. Last year WIT received money from the Associated Student Government and from two faculty members. These funds were used to purchase a computer for WIT members, many of whom are single mothers who need to be near a phone while they are preparing their class assignments, so their families can contact them, center volunteers say.

This year WIT has received a large donation from a local sponsor, and Women's Studies and Support Programs has agreed to match this donation with funds from its donors. Trafton says that the WIT officers are making plans to purchase new furnishings to make Garrett 102 more attractive.

The remainder of the money will be used to publicize the organization so that more students know of its existence and can make use of its services. Trafton also hopes that the organization can be able to respond to emergency situations that its members sometimes face.

"We have had members show up on Monday morning ready to quit school because their husbands may have disappeared with the paycheck and the only car that runs," says Trafton, adding:

"Such women need more than just an encouraging word to tide them over until they can access a social agency for support. We try to help in any way that we can, and sometimes this includes providing some limited financial support."

Wars says she thinks it is also important that WIT have an attractive meeting room.

"Many of the women who take advantage of the center's services are recovering from recent trauma in their lives such as divorce or the death of a spouse, or loss of a job," says Ward.

"Because the WIT room often is the only place where they feel psychologically safe when they first come to the University, new members spend to spend a lot of time in Garrett 102," she says, adding:

"If their room is attractive, it will improve these women's senses of self-worth. These women need a sign that tells them that they are an important part of the University community, and not just the recipients of cast-off furniture and supplies."
